

AG Fitch Hosts Human Trafficking Summit Engaging Faith Communities Across Mississippi

The fight against human trafficking requires all of us, especially our faith communities, working alongside law enforcement and service providers to help victims in their recovery. When people of faith come together to educate themselves and listen to survivors, they can bring hope, healing, and dignity to victims in our State. Thank you to the more than 500 attendees who joined us today to stand together in the fight to end human trafficking.

"The fight against human trafficking requires all of us, especially our faith communities, working alongside law enforcement and service providers to help victims in their recovery," said Attorney General Lynn Fitch. "When people of faith come together to educate themselves and listen to survivors, they can bring hope, healing, and dignity to victims in our State. Thank you to the more than 500 attendees who joined us today to stand together in the fight to end human trafficking."

The Summit featured informative panel discussions, powerful stories shared by survivors of human trafficking, and opportunities for participants to engage meaningfully in the fight to end human trafficking. Through education, collaboration, and service, attendees gained valuable insight into the realities of trafficking and the role communities play in addressing this crime. Engaging the faith community is a critical part of the Attorney General's efforts to combat human trafficking. In preparation for the International Day of Prayer and Awareness Against Human Trafficking on Sunday, February 8, faith leaders from across the state offered prayers during the Summit for victims and survivors, service providers, communities, and even traffickers and buyers. Churches and congregations are encouraged to use these resources.

As part of the Summit, participants assembled 550 Freedom Bags filled with essential items designed to meet the immediate needs of human trafficking victims and survivors. These bags will be distributed to law enforcement agencies and service providers across the state to use when they encounter victims, offering comfort, dignity, and practical support during critical moments.
